Jerry Burke, a disgraced Northwest Mounted Policeman, victimized by a group of fur raiders, is serving a term in prison and cannot prove his innocence. On the plea of his sweetheart, Nan, the warden lets him out of jail on his honor, to bring in his man and prove his own innocence. The warden is scathed by the police inspector and faces a severe penalty if his prisoner fails to return within the allotted time.

Hagan, head of the raiders, makes love to Nan who is hated by his jealous sister, Marie. The latter follows Nan to the woods where she keeps a tryst with Jerry. Then she warns Jerry of the duplicity of his sweetheart who has promised to elope to the north with Hagan. He has faith in Nan, however, and follows the party to the long sought cache of the raiders in the north, where he captures and binds two henchmen and then rescues Nan from Hagan's unwelcome advances. After a fist fight he binds Hagan, the ringleader, and with Nan rides back with his man, for during the fight, Marie has loosed the two henchmen, who have escaped. They ambush Jerry and throw him from his horse. Hagan escapes. With his time almost up, Jerry sends the girl home and goes after his man.

Back in the cache, he bests Hagan in a struggle and arrests him... His time is up. The attorney general reprimands the warden and suspends him from office in disgrace. Jerry staggers in with his prisoner. The warden is re-instated and Jerry is vindicated.

Jerry and Nan start living happily ever after.
